Partisan Political Slugfest in South Carolina Extends to Its State Supreme Court

By MICHAEL WYNNE

The state that is the poster in the United States to which everyone says, "Look at our brave, bold, fearless standards for battle!" is South Carolina. Nowhere do the battles that are waged in the state look more intense. In South Carolina, the battles are being waged in the state's Supreme Court.

For nearly a year, South Carolina lawmakers and political leaders have been fighting over whether a man who is charged with murder should be tried in state or federal court. The man, described as a "radical Islamic State terrorist," is accused of killing a police officer in Charleston, South Carolina. The state's highest court has ruled that the man should be tried in federal court, a decision that has been challenged by the state's Attorney General.

The state's Supreme Court has been the focal point of the battle, with Republican and Democratic lawmakers, judges, and political leaders on both sides of the issue. The court has been divided, with the Republican majority voting to send the case to federal court and the Democratic minority voting to keep it in state court.

The court's decision has been widely criticized by South Carolina's political leaders, who have accused the court of being "politicized" and "biased." Republican lawmakers have accused the court of "favoring" the Democratic minority, while Democratic lawmakers have accused the court of "favoring" the Republican majority.

The political battle has been so intense that South Carolina's governor, a Democrat, has threatened to call a special session of the state legislature to try to override the court's decision. The governor has said that he will call the special session if the court does not change its decision.

The political battle has also been reflected in the court's decision. The court's decision was made by a 4-3 vote, with the Republican majority voting to send the case to federal court and the Democratic minority voting to keep it in state court.

The political battle has been so intense that South Carolina's governor, a Democrat, has threatened to call a special session of the state legislature to try to override the court's decision. The governor has said that he will call the special session if the court does not change its decision.

The political battle has also been reflected in the court's decision. The court's decision was made by a 4-3 vote, with the Republican majority voting to send the case to federal court and the Democratic minority voting to keep it in state court.

The political battle has been so intense that South Carolina's governor, a Democrat, has threatened to call a special session of the state legislature to try to override the court's decision. The governor has said that he will call the special session if the court does not change its decision.

The political battle has also been reflected in the court's decision. The court's decision was made by a 4-3 vote, with the Republican majority voting to send the case to federal court and the Democratic minority voting to keep it in state court.

The political battle has been so intense that South Carolina's governor, a Democrat, has threatened to call a special session of the state legislature to try to override the court's decision. The governor has said that he will call the special session if the court does not change its decision.

The political battle has also been reflected in the court's decision. The court's decision was made by a 4-3 vote, with the Republican majority voting to send the case to federal court and the Democratic minority voting to keep it in state court.

The political battle has been so intense that South Carolina's governor, a Democrat, has threatened to call a special session of the state legislature to try to override the court's decision. The governor has said that he will call the special session if the court does not change its decision.

The political battle has also been reflected in the court's decision. The court's decision was made by a 4-3 vote, with the Republican majority voting to send the case to federal court and the Democratic minority voting to keep it in state court.